In addition to its intellectual and economic achievements, Edinburgh's cultural heritage flourished in the 19th century. The city's iconic landmarks, including the majestic Edinburgh Castle and the neoclassical architecture of the New Town, served as a testament to its storied past and enduring legacy.

Furthermore, Edinburgh's vibrant cultural scene was punctuated by the annual Edinburgh International Festival, a celebration of the arts that continues to draw artists and performers from around the world. The festival's inception in 1947 was a testament to the city's enduring commitment to creativity and cultural exchange, echoing the spirit of innovation that defined Edinburgh in the 19th century.

The Edinburgh Astronomical Institution founds the new Calton Hill observatory; the Union Canal is started; Edinburgh Castle houses the Scottish regalia, Edward Daniel Clarke, a Cambridge geologist and antiquarian, compares Edinburgh's topography to Athens, a comparison that landscape painter Hugh William Williams repeated in 1820, coining the terms "Modern Athens" and "Athens of the North" gas lighting first appears.
